Otherwise, you may have to continue reading. Children will really listen to when there is mutual respect between you and them. They will listen to you when they know that when you say something, you mean it, you mean. This is ten tips on getting your children to listen to them and respect you.1. Show mutual respect can get children listen with the demanding authority and the sentence with a fist of iron, but what is it that it costs? You can scream and scream your children in submission and obedience, but what is it that it costs? The cost will be your relationship with your long-term child, as the resentments will form in them. If you don't show respect for your children, it will be difficult to let them listen to. They can obey, but if you act as tyrant that requires the children to do what you say because you are responsible, then you're fighting a losing battle. The basis of your relationship must start with respect. Mutual respect is the foundation for any relationship, including the parent-child report. Avoid yellingwhen screaming and domain are the topics of the relationship, then a resentment background will develop in the child. No one wants to feel dominated, nor to feel that they are less value than another person. Your child know that you appreciate them through respectful interactions. You're still the parent, but you can the parent and get your children listen to respective interaction. When using challenging parenting, authoritarian parenting methods, you are mining your relationship with the child and the resentments are likely to form. If you go back to scream, screaming and making requests, then you are getting your ability to get the respect of your child in the long term. 3. Use the golden ruler is founded on the golden rule: it deals with others as you want to be treated. If you want your child to respect you, you must also treat them with respect. This means talking to your son in a kind, genuine and thoughtful tone. Of course, this is not easy when your four-year-old is having a tracol in the 5th of the grocery store and you have many more commissions to do, work to do, and there is no extra time available. It takes practice for the parent without screaming and intensify emotions. We are still people and angry for our children. However, we must keep in mind that they are learning and we have much years of practice in these things. We must maintain our fresh and maintained authority The parentality. How do you want to talk when you have a bad day and you want to dissolve you? So you should talk to your son who is having a meltdown and obviously he has a bad day. day. Love and respect, if combined with the authority, creates a relationship in which your child will listen to you and will respect you. Treats as you want to be treated.4. Make sure your words have consequences we know that mutual respect is the first step to get our children listen. This sense will help you be open to what we have to say. If they feel that it matters because they respects them, then they will develop respect for you. This will help when it comes to discipline your child. The second step is ensuring that our words have consequences. When it comes to disciplinary, your words must have weight. If you say to do something, you have to do it. For example, if you ask your son to stop hitting the sofa while you are typing an article for Lifehack and continue to hit it, then let you know that if you don  ~ T Stop, get a five-minute timeout. True Story, it's just successful. He stopped. Why did it stop? Because he knew I meant what I said. If he didn't stop, he knew he would mean an immediate time, not a further warning and more time to continue with the behavior I asked him to stop. I asked in a calm voice as he looked at him's eyes, letting him know that I was serious. He also knows that I mean what I say because he now has seven years old and has experienced a substantial one with the punishments for years. I don't ask the same thing anymoon. I don't have threats. I follow with reasonable punishments when the instructions and requests are not followed by my son. 5. Avoid Big Threats! I saw parents make great threats, thinking that bigger is the threat, more the child is likely to stop behavior. This is not reasonable, nor is a good idea. The great threats that do not follow you with make your words meaningless. For example, if you told my son that I would have launched the toys of him if he won't stop hitting the sofa, it would have been unreasonable. Launch the toys that cost some money to buy as a result of a small infringement (hit the sofa while I'm writing) is unreasonable. If he continued to hit the sofa, what should I do? It would be unrealistic actually throw away toys. Therefore, many parents in this case will continue to do the same threat without actual problems. The threats continue because the behavior continues and even intensifies (ie the sofa that strikes becomes stronger and stronger) and finally, the parent must throw away the toys and / or locations at a different sentence to stop the escalation . The escalation could have been avoided by stating realistic consequences and following the first time. Time-outs and take off a toy or privilege are all reasonable. I often put the time of my son's tablet or give a five-minute time accordingly. Avoid making great threats that I can't follow with a good conscience. It helps me long term because when giving reasonable consequences, I can easily follow with the punishment at that time and not feel terrible. Wire to make great threats that you cannot follow with a good conscience. Instead, to provide consequences with warnings and make sure the punishment is worthy of behavior. Small infringements should get small consequences. The great infractions require more serious consequences. Do not take the habit of making great threats of great consequences that you can actually make it enforced .6. Follow the parenting method in which a parent follows with their consequences immediately is called   ,~  "Ons Ask. "In this method, a parent asks their child once to do something. If they don't do it, then the parent provides a consequence if they don't do as requested. For example, if you ask your child to put their dishes in the sink , but they don't get up and start doing the Then the parent can let the child know the consequence if they do not follow with what was asked. If they don't put away their dishes, dishes, They are about to lose half an hour of their TV time. They do not get three warnings or even two. A warning is all that comes. If the instructions do not follow, then the consequence is distributed. In this example, if the child did not put their dishes away after the warning is provided, then the parent follows and says "I am sorry, but now you lost the half of your TV time for tonight. , ,~ The parent must therefore not allow the child to watch TV and can suggest instead of reading books or playing outside. This method will help you the parent with consistency.7. From then your full attention when you're talking to your son. Look in the eyes and give them your full attention. This approach is much more fruitful in obtaining your son to listen to distracted attention, partial. Houses in point: if a parent is playing a game on their phone and screams through The room to make their child go, the interaction is less significant than making a face to face. If the parent establishes the phone and turns to their child and looks into their son's eyes and says: " time to quit of Gua Plain the TV for now and do your homework, you can watch after the tasks are finished   ,~ "is much more likely to be fruitful because complete attention is provided. Give your child your full attention with Visual contact and face-to-face interactions show them that you care and you are serious about what you're saying. This will go very far to get your child to listen and respond to what you need to say.8. Show genuine attention that interests you is immensely significant to any child. Your child needs to know that you care about them. Your words, shares and tone of voice show that he interests you. If he interested you, make sure you show it. For example, if I want my children put the table for dinner, screaming them saying "Know his time for dinner, you should have set up the table five minutes do  ,~ will not be produced how to make a declaration of preparation. One such Preparation statement could be   ,~ "Do a great job to set up the dining table. It is so beautiful to work together, with me doing the meal and you put the  
