The crew simulation © what makes the design of the ship so interesting, because how fast a canon can fire o r how long a shield can be charged depends directly on its quick crew Deliver weapons or energy to it. As a player, you will have to think carefully about how you design the layout of your ship s o it works in maximum efficiency without exposing its most vulnerable (and sometimes explosive!) Hands. Each ship is part o f a 2D physical simulation, and the position and direction of its thrusters realistically affects its movement. Small ships with many thrusters are fast and fast, while large ships with proportionally less thrusters are naturally slower and harder to manoeuvre. Weapons obey the laws o f simulation of physics. Whether a canon or laser hits an enemy does not depend on a given roll, but on the trajectory of the shot and the size and speed of the enemy. Damage is only monitored by one method, and each method may be individually targeted. Some hands may explode, causing collateral damage to the surrounding hands, so you will have to think carefully about where to put your reactors and munitions. Very close to the edge and you will be exposed to enemy fire. Too far away and their weapons won't fire fast enough. Ships can separate into several parts when their connecting hands are destroyed. Normally, this will be a disabling blow, but any piece that has a control room, power and thrusters can continue to operate independently, potentially maintaining a threat to the enemy.
