Then he says that once he has accepted his commitment, he will draft a motion for the government never to consider slavery again. Therefore, he cannot get his proposal approved, a fact that Jefferson and Madison make fun of him. Jefferson's philosophies were thus opposed to Hamilton's First Report on Public Credit, because it analyzed the financial situation of the United States of America and made recommendations for reorganizing the national debt and establishing public credit[4]. Creating national public credit would increase the power of the federal government, something unprecedented in U.S. history. Finally he says that he tried to ban slavery before, but was unable to gain any political support, making Franklin's proposal politically impossible, even if it was a good idea. Hamilton Hamilton's verse punishes the idea of waiting until 1808 to do anything about slavery, noting that as the population grows, it<sup>3</sup> become increasingly difficult to deal with the problem. Whatever you want, I'm dead. ("Be, even you, have hundreds of slaves, whose descendants curse our names when we are safe in our graves.")
